Professor Rodolfo Mendoza-Denton has lived in Mexico, Ivory Coast, Thailand, and the United States. These travels cemented an early interest in culture and intergroup relations. After receiving his B.A. at Yale University, he pursued a Ph.D. in social psychology at Columbia University under the mentorship of Walter Mischel and Geraldine Downey. He remained at Columbia for postdoctoral training, and joined the psychology faculty at the University of California, Berkeley in 2002. His professional interests include stereotyping and prejudice from the perspective of both target and perceiver, intergroup relations, cultural psychology, and educational achievement.

The Outstanding Faculty Series provides an informal forum for students to learn from and about UC Berkeley Faculty. Topics of discussion vary—some are very personal, giving detailed, accounts of their experiences as an undergraduate and graduate student, while others focus on career choices, research interest, current publications, or higher education in general.

All students are welcome…Bring Your Lunch